Watchdog Resolution

CPYRGHT

WASHINGTON, April 2 — Rep. Abner W. Sibal R-Conn. and Rep. Emilio Q. Daddario D-Conn., are among the sponsors of a joint resolution to establish a Congressional watchdog committee over the Central Intelligence Agency and the intelligence activities of the U. S.

The resolution has the backing of 14 Democrats and five Republicans.

Rep. Sibal has called for a major overhauling of U. S. intelligence noting that "they are failing us now and until they are replaced by effective measures, we will continue to lose the initiative against Communism."

Rep. Sibal was specific in saying that he did not believe every classified matter should be disclosed to Congress and gone over by a committee but that it is the "duly constituted responsibility of the Congress" to oversee in some proper degree all intelligence matters including the operations of the CIA.

FAVORS INSPECTION

International inspection of atomic facilities can be a key to peace and aid in the development of international safeguards, Rep. Emilio Q. Daddario, D-Conn., maintains.

Noting that the U. S. delegate at Geneva, Adrian Fisher, has announced willingness to let the International Atomic Energy Agency inspect the reactor at Rowe, Mass. Rep. Daddario declared: "When this large reactor is inspected, the results can help to provide greater safeguards for peaceful nuclear activities. The offer of inspection has been made without regard to what other states may do with their reactors but the offer is to be an example and this nation has urged the other states and the Soviet Union to apply international safeguards on their own reactors as well."

"Once there is such an exchange, it could be broadened, but the key would be effective safeguards. Our nation wants to make sure that peaceful atomic energy activities should not be diverted to military purposes and the practical effects of making peaceful reactors available for inspection can be just that."

Rep. Daddario termed the Fisher move "a dramatic approach to the problem of controlling international activities in the field of nuclear energy."
